JAMES RODGERS, P.M.

Oliver Wendell Holmes' Fun-The Dry Goods Salesman.

"The Poet at the Breakfast Table" says

(in the August Atlantic) that he treasures up with interest all the words uttered by the salesman—and then goes on to make a sketch of that person:

It must have been noticed that he very rarely speaks. Perhaps he has an inner life, with his own depemotional and lofty contemplative elements, but as we see him he is the boarder reduced to the simplest expression of that term. Yet, like most human creatures, he has generic and specific characters not unworthy of being studied. I notice particularly a certain electrical briskness of movement, such as one may see in a squirrel, which clearly belongs to his calling. The dry goods man's life behind his counter is a succession of sudden, snappy perceptions, and brief series of co-ordinated spasms, as thus:

"Purple calico, three-quarters wide, six yards."

"Up goes the arm; bang! tumbles out the flat iron, and turns half a dozen corners, as if for the fun of the thing; the six yards of calico hurry over the measuring-nails, hunching their backs up, like six canker-worms; out jump the scissors; snip, clip, rip; the stuff is wispied up, brown-papered, tied labelled, delivered, and the man is himself again, like a child just come out of a convulsion fit. Think of a man's having some hundreds of these semi-epileptic seizures every day, and you need not wonder that that he does not say much; these fits take the talk all out of him.

But because he, or any other man, does not say much, it does not follow that he may not have, as I have said, an exalted and intense inner life. I have known a number of cases where a man who seemed thoroughly commonplace and unemotional has all at once surprised everybody by telling the story of his hidden life far more pointedly and dramatically than any playwright or novelist or poet could have told it for him. I will not insult your intelligence, beloved, by saying how he has told it.
